Exhaustion

In the bathroom parlor of my stain-glass pseudo-gothic revival church there were two mirrors facing each other.

I would wait until the sermon to pee. And then I’d stand in the parlor and enjoy what in child’s time felt like days and may have been eight minutes of staring at myself and my other self and my other other self But that kind of thing has messed with my head.
It is one thing to stare into the abyss for a minute or 8 but to stare infinitely into infinity is just exhausting.

Age has replaced writing what I have learned with writing about whether learning is possible.
One suggestion of solipsism should have been enough.
But people keep telling me my brain is in a jar keep making me write I don’t know anything.
I’d like to know something again but the world has fallen away and all there are are dueling mirrors gold leaf flaking into frosted flakes revealing grayblack metal beneath the ornate like the column half greco roman half iron cross beam displayed by the college for the arts signifying something too blunt to be understood. wasn’t the cross made of wood?

breakfast cereal and a sinful child a table sculpted in gold relief not relieving any concerns of andrew simon or soggy milk grandma purchased a red twirly dress to lure her to church in her sunday best grandpa counting the sequins on her sash trying to keep track: were there thirty? she spun too fast for him to tally was hers the dance of seven veils? hers legs were too thin her feet too curled did blame rest in his genes or her heart? the pastor’s water could provide a cure while leaving his questions without answers a congregation of healing hands concealing the child’s unpolished feet carpenter composed of iron varnished cross looking down on aging bodies curving in tan suits and ties pastor slides his fingers on a gilt page unknowingly wearing it back to plain she takes off their hands and their red dress dancing and limping in stained lightness she will suffer in sulfur lakes said someone shaking his hat and tie she’ll face first and second death so she asked if they were naked in the garden or if they were born in their sunday best Mind Body Problem

Loathsome limbs on an X-marked ash:
the nature of a hospital parking lot.

“...inverted champagne bottle calves” led to the doctor’s purple sharpie

X imparting what skin the scalpel would cleave. The nurse could not find the veins. Neither could the anesthesiologist.

The arms were covered in crayola colored bandaids before the needle found a place between knuckles. I was then wheeled away from an embrace to an all-white room I’d seen before. The blue men told me to stare at the ceiling where someone had hung a hotel quality drawing of a Hawaiian beach.

“Count backward from ten” so we can laugh when you don’t pass nine, the blue men said.

I did not dream of the palms. I did not dream of the tree in the parking lot.

Instead, I watched the operation.
Monster

The invalid is a parasite on society.
At a certain point it is indecent to go on living.

I want to suck your social welfare.

our circus history permits it

Lazarus affirmed you and Joannes told you nothing

Geriatric Manual

bath tub once an escape the size of a small swimming hole with age has become as confined as the eyes inside her porcelain doll limbs bend over themselves to stuff within its boundaries floundering he tries to keep her purple fiberglass and polyester concoction out of water in accordance with doctor’s orders depending on how impersonal he keeps his kitchen hands while they wrap around her thighs slather soap into her crevices

depending on
    in which crevices they rest from which they move away at a healthy pace does the loofah dance across her body like tulle escaping the bride’s gown to enjoin itself with the clouds of adipose flesh pushing out around her belly and chest?

does the loofah lather then rinse alternating appropriately saving labia for last with a final speedy pass followed by a lukewarm pour of water as lukewarm as the church in laodicea ready to be spit out by her memory immediately after she exits the bath or does the loofah linger not at all precise so unlike the medical cabinets keeping each blanket the proper temperature to warm but never burn her is his the touch of a kindly nurse rubbing behind an old man’s ear to increase his oxytocin glad his member is no longer so easily provoked as to show the nurse what it was in the man he actually inspired the girl in the tub is twenty-four and her lover carries her body out the bathroom door and onto a bed where it she climbs on all fours hanging purple fiberglass and foot precisely over the edge so as not to be smushed as he carefully positions himself between her legs like a pointillist balancing passion and precision with each thrust Still Composing Collective Matters

I’m sitting on the subway reading an article that says people in cities don’t help each other when it’s noisy.

I can only be aware of so many things.
Are you okay?

I drive down a famous highway listening to music that rhymes sun with fun and coast with most.
I drive to the coast with the most cameos in movies. I stand crushed by the weight of Tony Stark’s digitally placed 3D mansion. A man paints flora while wearing a smock in what I imagine is Stark’s kitchen. He does not know the flora he paints is invasive to these chaparral headlands. I do not know this either.
I do not know the real estate agents tried to convince people the promontory’s name was pronounced duMAY. I do not know that well before that the name was Dumetz until a couple letters were left off a map.
I know the now name is ominous as I drag my body down manmade steps. I am grateful for altered landscapes as I squeeze my hands into the wire diamonds of the fence and distribute my weight enough to stop my ankles from bending beneath me. Nature is farther from bodies like mine.
I stand crushed by the statue of liberty painted on pictures of this beach and shown in the final scenes so the audience would know the planet of the apes was our own. But I do not smell apes or salt as the ocean gets closer. I smell your mother.
There are maggots in your mother. But the model does not notice as she poses on the pinnacles.
I do not notice the signs that say getting near you will result in a 10,000 dollar fine. I do not know you have the dirtiest mouth of any mammal and a bite 10 times stronger than a pit bull. You get up on your flippers and do a dance I have only seen behind plate glass. The model finally notices and asks, “Should we carry him back into the water?” I do not know that you do not have enough body fat to return to the ocean, but I still say no. I do not know the unseasonably warm currents have made your food source scarcer. I do not know you are washing up by the hundreds. My wobbly legs lead me back up the trail to the car. I am out of breath as I stumble past the painter. “Are you ok?” he asks.
She'd Celebrate That

hands extend lotioned
one on each side

she reaches out willing her fingers to possess softness wishing olive oil sugar scrubs had buffed their impurities weeks before the event heads bow sugared eyes close obscuring their dilation in a prayer of celebration of pink and purple foiled chocolate eggs hunted between dutchman's breeches snow drops

    forsythia
    and mud

her skinny legs
    unable to support arms and stomach often mistaken as its own celebration of life her skinny legs
had not bent down in dirt had not bowed to hide sweet surprises for the young to find in remembrance of ishtar or christ but her head bows now with the rest in celebration of a vacated sepulcher in celebration of stone    exchanged for flesh in celebration of blood    circulating and fresh her hands    rigid and cold shake against lotioned palms she must hold as the prayer drones on about all that is good cancer has not returned rebirth is well-represented in the garden safe travels brought the table all these hands clasped together believing without wounds to touch

   but her hands    aching her fingers     needing to extend as his body had been extended by nails placed to stretch him her hands     rigid     waiting as unforgiving as the wood on which they laid him known as the cross on which they still display him suffering for them wood traded in the casts for silver     platinum     gold     or plastic her hands     posed in prayer on sunday her hands     cold as the stone on which he was laid her hands refuse her access to the morning of the third day friday’s physicality thorns on head nails in hands and feet lance through side

   friday’s physicality
   remains her sunday reality her belief hinges on sight
       on movement on sound on pain

blessed are they that do not shake at inopportune times blessed are they that do not ache loudly blessed are they that do not bend in improper places blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed on sunday morning as the prayer ends she does not utter amen denying the table’s mouths unison affirmation instead she opens and closes her hands before obscuring them under the table while the others pick up forks and stab into ham unaware of the wounds they press into flesh as they stab and chew the cross hangs above them vacant for protestants focus on resurrection she focuses on hands trying to control her flesh long enough to stop shaking now that would call for celebration

Erasure
Dress Normal

The last time I went to the surgeon he wanted my toe.
I said no.
Before that, he asked if he could put me into a cage, just my leg, each bar of the cage would be pushed entirely through my calf so it could be periodically tightened. He called it a halo and said don’t be frightened, we guarantee you’ll be normal looking soon.
New Shoes

after Amy Lowell’s “Red Slippers”

Dad drove the impala nervous to the mall.
Only plastic bags were left to leaf the trees.
Greybrown leftovers of snow coated the lot: where Burlington sold coats to keep each winter from the body and cars passed on black rubber tracks to the ground and J.C. Penny propped red heels in a window display, taking eyes off people’s feet. They were dreaming of stalactites lovers, direction, rockets, and purchased polish.
I was looking down, imagining shoving my left foot on a silver Brannock, sliding to find its size—slide—And Dad is mad he says about how slowly I lace the thick tan shoes.
“Walk heel—toe, not thud—thud.” And I am crying about how the round brown shoes push on my toes.
And I don’t understand how blunt the shoes are, even as metaphors. And I don’t fit in my father’s.

Horror movie monsters are born of mistaken doctors. The antichrist often belongs to a blonde. I hide my claw toes in the coiled strands of myself I have to pass on. What about monsters who have children in the movies?

I can only think of spiders and their hordes of hideous progeny. Que Sera Sera someone says until it’s time to see the genetic counselor.

Yahoo Answers has a lot to say about the ancestral fear of every mother for her child. The mother of the groom has a lot to say about Wikipedia’s pictures of my feet or at least pictures of feet that look enough like mine she knows what I’ve been disguising behind dollar store tights.

Even Erik of the Opera can have his mask removed with a google image search. Though his differences lessen with each incarnation, I have a 50 percent chance of having a child who feels the need to hide part of themself.

I have a 50 percent chance of having a child whose gait relies on unique muscles, who creates a dance from the act of walking. The counselor thinks I shouldn’t gamble.
Dance of the Seven Hospital Gowns

Cast of Characters

DOCTOR: A man wearing a white coat.

CAMERAMAN: A person with an old box camera and handheld flash. Face completely obscured by black sheet.

ATTENDANT: A man wearing scrubs.

PATIENT: A woman with a disability wearing a hospital gown, plain stockings, and institutional underwear.

AUDIENCE: Three bystanders holding smart phones.

OFFSTAGE: A commanding voice.

MAN: A confused man.

Setting: A theater. A single hospital bed sits center stage. A closed curtain is hung down center.

Enter CAMERAMAN. CAMERAMAN establishes location up right and does not move for the rest of the production.

Enter DOCTOR. DOCTOR opens curtain.

Enter AUDIENCE from house through curtain.

DOCTOR: (TO OFFSTAGE) Line?

OFFSTAGE: Tonight, fine citizens...

DOCTOR: No one would say that.
OFFSTAGE: According to the dramaturge it’s accurate to the time period.

DOCTOR: What time period exactly? All we have is a curtain, a hospital bed, and an elderly camera.

OFFSTAGE: Get back on script.

Doctor: Tonight, fine citizens, you will see contorted bodies and the minds that match them. You will learn to identify dull-normals from their specific bodily signs. You will meet a patient afflicted with madness as well as a few feeble-minded females. To our best estimates, the feeble-minded make up 2.5 percent of the...

Enter ATTENDANT, carrying PATIENT, interrupting...

ATTENDANT: Make way! Stand back! Keep your voices quiet! I’ve brought the first patient.

PATIENT: Oh, you must be exhausted from carrying me, Jon. I’m well over the threshold now. Why don’t you just lay me on the bed?

DOCTOR: Attendant, put the patient on the bed. (To AUDIENCE) I will now field any questions you may have about this patient’s derangement.

DOCTOR crosses to AUDIENCE and they converse in dull tones.

PATIENT: I’m out of jokes. I’m cold. Do I have to do this in front of them? (Gestures to AUDIENCE) And that? (Gestures to CAMERAMAN)

ATTENDANT: Medicine needs you and...I don’t want to say this next part, but I can picture it there on the page...Medicine needs you and your funny little body. That (gestures to CAMERAMAN) is how he will teach people to recognize what’s wrong with others experiencing your same symptoms. He needs the publicity and you need his help.

PATIENT: But I...

DOCTOR finishes his conversation with AUDIENCE and returns to ATTENDANT.

DOCTOR: Attendant, I believe I told you to place the patient on the bed. We need the rest of the supplies for the demonstration, and you have other patients to prepare.

ATTENDANT: (placing PATIENT on bed) Can I get you some water?

PATIENT: Surely there are more interesting things you can get me.

ATTENDANT: (exiting the stage) Water and heated blankets it is.

DOCTOR: The patient will now remove the gown and stockings.

PATIENT sexually rolls down stockings and removes gown revealing institutional undergarments.

(TO OFFSTAGE) Do I really have to be so clinical?

OFFSTAGE: I don’t see anyone else in a clinician’s jacket.

DOCTOR removes the white coat.

FORMER DOCTOR walks offstage.

MAN walks on stage looking confused.

MAN puts on white coat.
MAN is now DOCTOR.

DOCTOR: (While rolling pointer down PATIENT’s back) Notice the arch of the back is like that of an elderly person suffering from dementia.

Camera flashes.

(While gesturing with pointer toward PATIENT’s eyes, one at a time) See the uneven eyes. Physiognomy is just beginning to show us the link between derangement of the mind and misalignment of the face.

PATIENT winks.

Camera flashes.

(While pointing at PATIENT’s hands and feet) Note the lack of control of the limbs. This shaking demonstrates the patient lacks the psychic capacity to restrain the physical form.

Camera flashes.

PATIENT stands and removes undergarments, smiling at AUDIENCE.

(_DOCTOR clears throat and points to breasts and genitals._) Note... the breasts and vulva of the patient, demonstrating she is female.

Camera flashes.

(To Offstage) Attendant! (To AUDIENCE) As you can see from these obvious physical features, the patient is a...yes...well...the fact of this will be ever clearer in the following demonstration.

ATTENDANT enters with blanket, water, and a large syringe.
DOCTOR nods toward PATIENT.

ATTENDANT on seeing PATIENT drops water.

ATTENDANT: Oh dear, you must be cold. (To AUDIENCE) Look away! Look away! It will just be a second while I cover the patient.

Camera flashes.

ATTENDANT, with head turned away but periodically peeking, wraps PATIENT in blanket.

PATIENT: Why the syringe, Jon?

DOCTOR: Now the attendant will inject a calming fluid in the patient so that we can more freely observe the movements of the irregular body.

PATIENT: (Shrugging off blanket) You don’t need to do that to freely observe my body. (Begins dancing around ATTENDANT. ATTENDANT openly gazes.)

DOCTOR: (To ATTENDANT) Please restrain the patient. (To Audience) As you can see, the patient’s lack of psychic ability prevents the fluidity of motion a high-functioning moron or a common person possesses.

PATIENT runs hand down ATTENDANT’S arm to take syringe during dance.

PATIENT dances behind attendant, lifts his coat and injects him with the syringe.

ATTENDANT falls to the floor between PATIENT’s legs.

PATIENT continues dancing.

DOCTOR: The derangement of the patient can be seen by the movement of the eyes, as previously stated, and the madness which afflicts her body can be seen in her present actions. Unfortunately, we will not be seeing any other patients tonight. This concludes the demonstration of feeblemindedness. Please exit the theater.

DOCTOR closes curtain and wheels it around, keeping it between AUDIENCE and PATIENT as AUDIENCE returns to the house.

ATTENDANT remains unmoving on the floor.

Doctor: Again, this concludes the presentation.

Camera flashes.

Spot from behind on PATIENT to project shadow dance. DOCTOR keeps moving curtain to obscure PATIENT.

PATIENT dances.

PATIENT is still dancing as main curtain closes.

Pictures of Stars on a Glowing Screen apple’s first logo features newton sitting beneath a tree as in his mythology an apple waits over him an apple to conk the man with understanding like the second blow to a sitcom character’s head at an apple computer, a decade ago, sat a middleschooler searching for understanding of her body understanding she could gain without head injury she searched by typing to strangers strangers who asked her to articulate what the body wore what the body looked like what the body wanted apple’s later logo cuts the extraneous leaving only the fruit trading the origin of human’s understanding of gravity for an even older story serpents and power cords are almost indistinguishable when the lights are off his face glowing by the light of his screen her face featured on the screen that lights his how much more of herself would she put in the frame?

apples and tomatoes are challenging to distinguish no matter the position of the lights this is the official, although possibly-disingenuous reason the company claims to have bitten the fruit in this story of beginnings any fruit will do the original didn’t specify which kind only that a bite need be taken presently she reenacts conversations she’s been having with glowing faces and text boxes for a decade the voice that moans to her picked its tone after hearing something similar issue from computer speakers she bites the woman’s thigh with a gentleness almost indistinguishable from the manner a woman once promised she’d be bitten a manner first conveyed to her in text on a glowing screen It's Still Life

drinking like she dreams to see it from another perspective to leave it and come back traveling without tangible distance without maps or at least google directions to articulate actual space no mileage number to cling to or mile markers to count but still further away you have to be careful about things like liking to drink by yourself if only for the viewer’s sake because they might try to stop you if you differ too much from the picture of regular they’ve been collaging in their mind she’s fine around friends whose parents tipped back many too many bottles or who saw as much violence as she somewhere other than a screen they can differentiate the softness of her stomach from the harshness of their lives

I’ve forgotten about the picture I’m not very good at keeping life still It’s probably because of how close I am to the girl asleep on the bed with her fluffy red curls shaping into spikes with the help of a pillow I have the almost same now spikey puffy head two hours later about 45 degrees different no more I lean a little sitting clicking on the bed with the computer screen open to reveal time she couldn’t sleep forever making this whole thing difficult to write like drawing someone who flails too much when they talk or drawing yourself in a mirror and trying not to draw yourself drawing but rather doing something better and she and I and we probably shouldn’t have told you about all this if we really want distance she can’t be me writing can’t be truth and if it is it needs to be someone else’s truth which is good to know but not particularly relevant when they take a Steven King novel and eliminate the supernatural for the screen as if it needs to be more real than it already was they’ve forgotten we all need to travel they’ve forgotten they are we or maybe they don’t watch what they make I’m looking out the space between the building and the molding of the window where the lit grey sky is light enough to write by hoping one time when the firmament spins the sun away and the other side of the window is dark enough to leave her reflected face for me I won’t feel compelled to write to further her away from me NightLife

once I stayed up all night asking questions well actually I’ve been doing that every night since I saw Doc nearly fall from the clock since I realized movies time-travel life are about death every star in the sky is on its way to one some are already gone but I don’t know it yet this time though I wasn’t seven wasn’t alone in bed watching soon-to-be dead sky from window

I was twenty-two and up asking you you with a voice across your card table questions I’d compiled since Doc’s near death questions you mostly responded to with questions then in the midst of whys and wheres and hows we asked what in that moment we were hoping for we argued semantics for awhile trying not to leave the ease of asking questions for fumbling answers you were going to make enough money to raise kids comfortably enough that they could go where you had gone or somewhere else entirely you would save questions for a few late nights trust answers enough to function again ignore ends all for them as much as possible

once I asked a group of people to write four hopes four fears down on paper without names I began sticking them to my body thinking I would symbolically carry all their burdens for them connecting me to empathy enough that I could touch I didn’t see anything on the papers that hadn’t been mine in idea before I began sticking them to myself in failed hope symbolism could be held

I reach across the table that had been a place for questions make you pull each empty paper from my body I left them on after the experiment hoping meaning is directly proportionate to time elapsed you put each some where I won’t have to think about we press in collapsing the folding legs of a table we built Babel on before God can get around to it we don’t remember ever projecting purpose on the table as our mouths opened wide to touch flesh instead of make words with all your talk of children you grab a durex from your pocket pretty fast when you’re done you will forget to pull out we will forget we can put the table back up between us that its legs are meant to exist or not exist when we please we will want to believe ends are more than symbols so we will just stay there on the floor we will have become one like the preacher told us we would we will die there maybe they’ll bury us together certainly they’ll write an article about our decaying form we will get a little death notice in the paper maybe someone will even take a picture in our end we will become someone else’s idea I sent a picture of my legs to New York He needed to see me so things don’t /get stagnant/I know it’s no longer just a picture of my legs

I took one night
those legs are me

He hears me mention that I’m changing into my pajamas so sees my hand running down those legs the ones covered in brown tights in the picture in forever

I change into pajamas but am still wearing brown tights with tennis shoes I tell him I’m naked and am still wearing brown tights with tennis shoes on the pink sheets that won’t need to be changed ever or maybe he imagines that like doug funny

I have a dresser full of identical brown tights a closet full of tennis shoes each with the same saturation in any light but that doesn’t solve the problem of the bed I never get off in his mind how does this get him off?

two legs brown tights a mildly suggestive hand he knows what my face looks like from other pictures he has had longer and the video chat that I laugh but won’t strip on goofy faces and smiles aren’t how he wants to take me so I send him legs and crop out goofy face that doesn’t understand how to contrive sexy

I read cosmo all day hoping I’d see it on their faces they taught me how to be blank so he can fill in a new experience each time he imagines with the picture the face is a new face whatever face he wants he wants a manikin that most fashions will fit on whose body won’t go out of fashion until the next flop between curves and ribs hits a generation far from now a generation that will never hit him cosmo taught me just fine this isn’t to insult the reading material but no matter how well I know something that well doesn’t translate into doing it 18 pictures later I had communicated what it was like to try to look not goofy but rather sexy all the while knowing I really need to not look goofy but rather sexy so things won’t /get stagnant/while taking pictures with the intent of making space he can progress in still

I gave him a pair of browntight legs a suggestive hand a pink-sheeted bed and he texted back

/I love you/
